

EXCERPT FROM A DOCUMENT ENTITLED

"FEDERAL FUNDS FOR EDUCATION 1952-1953, 1953-1954."

IN PROCESS OF PREPARATION BY THE OFFICE OF EDUCATION

A review and summary of the Quattlebaum report is presented in table 1 to demonstrate the extent and variety of Federal interest and participation in educational services. In the table are listed brief statements which describe 298 educational services.

This analysis indicates the very broad nature of the Federal programs. It shows that some of these educational services may be expected to be of personal value to almost every individual in the Nation at some time in his life. Federally supported training that citizens of the United States receive under these programs may be associated with the public schools, private schools, universities, vocational education, vocational rehabilitation, farming, business, government, military service office management, health, currency, thrift, research, civil defense, law enforcement, handicaps, veterans' education, citizenship, penal institutions, surveys, social security, occupied areas, school lunches, conservation, national parks, libraries, apprenticeship, and numerous other facets of education in the national life.

One remarkable feature revealed by table 1 is the emphasis placed upon the acquisition, as well as the dissemination, of information and understanding both for the general welfare and the defense of the American people. Most of the agencies which were reported to be administering activities in education appear to be convinced that the best service can be provided only through on-going in-service training programs for their employees. Through these in-service training programs, the Government improves the quality and quantity of the public service it renders to the American people.

Another remarkable feature of the interest of the Federal Government in educational programs, as revealed in table 1, is the great emphasis that is placed upon the advancement of learning. In each of the major groups it appears that most of the activities are at the post-high school or higher education levels. Fewer than 15 percent of the activities are planned for the direct benefit of the younger population in the elementary and secondary schools. Many programs are associated with (1) research, (2) development of scientists and leaders, and (3) raising the level of understanding and learning for general welfare. Improvement of the educational and informational status of people throughout the world, especially those in underdeveloped areas, is further evidence of this Federal interest in the general advancement of learning.

It is emphasized, however, that the programs in education as outlined in table 1 are based upon information for the 1949-50 school year. Since that year, some of the activities which were reported have been eliminated, some have been combined with other activities or perhaps transferred to other offices, while certain new activities have been introduced. These changes represent discontinued services, completed studies of research, or new problems and responsibilities which are of national concern. Some other activities appear year after year inasmuch as they represent continuing or on-going programs.
